Bids Out For Sea Water Conversion Pilot Plant

Southern California Edison Company hopes to start construction of a pilot sea water conversion plant adjacent to its Mandalay Steam Station, now under construction near Oxnard, around the first of the year.

Invitations for proposals covering equipment for the pilot plant have been issued and are expected to be received by the end of September. The company has earmarked $100,000 in its budget for the start of the project, Blanchard said.

In announcing the company's research plans today, Blanchard emphasized that Edison is primarily interested in comparing several processes to determine which appears more promising from an economic and engineering standpoint. The company is particularly interested in the possibilities for the use of heat which would otherwise be unused.

THE PROCESSES to be studied would take partially spent steam from the last stages of a steam turbine and utilize the remaining heat to evaporate sea water under varying conditions so as to produce potable water.

It is anticipated that converted sea water—although more costly than natural water—might be used to meet part of the fresh water needs of Mandalay Steam Station.

BLANCHARD MADE it clear that up to now the company has no cost data and no actual engineering tests to show what may be practical. "The Edison Company simply hopes to learn the answers to these questions through this pilot plant research," he said.

The Edison executive also noted that from present data there seems "no responsible
